FURTADO,J.I. The status and future of the tropical moist forest in Southeast Asia, p. 73-120, in MacAndrews & Chia, Developing economics and the environment (1979).

Coverage (by implication) is Thailand, Malaysia, Indonesia, and the Philippines. A terse, balanced overview, packed with facts, mostly on Malaya. Under The Resource Base come climate and soils, forest succession, bioproduction, cycles, flora, fauna, drainage. Under Development and Environmental Impacts come mining, forestry, shifting cultivation, agriculture, animal husbandry and fisheries. Under Future Prospect comes conservation, planning and strategies. Plea for modernization through restrained flexibility, a truly holistic approach; the vision is optimistic and open-ended ... with the danger that the latter condition, always under the banner of sustained yield, will come to apply all too literally to the forests. Impressive documentation in 132 notes.—M.J.

Critical overview of a large project in the Upang delta of the Rivers Musi and Banyuasin near Palembang. Swamp forests on shallow peat were converted into farmland (rice). Peat land use, mangrove use, fisheries, and transport are interfering in cases. Problems may turn up on 19 points in the following sectors: 1. Soil toxification/fertility declining, 2. Land instability/river shallowing, 3. Low water quality/salt intrusion, 4. Catastrophic flood/drought, 5. Fisheries decline, 6. Forest product shortage, 7. Vegetation succession/competition, 8. Agricultural pest outbreaks, 9. Disease and vector build-up, 10. Stability of banks, roads, bridges, and their maintenance, 11. Multiple allocation of the same resource, 12. Underutilization of resources, 13. Insidious environmental degradation; altogether there are 104 problem areas. For effective development 42 broad categories of 'environmental standards' are identified where control is necessary. Authors find "no basis to express either profound optimism or pessimism about the outcome" (p. 174). Let them reread their own clinical, sobering paper.—M.J.

 A most important census of this large family (c. 500 spp.) with keys of identification to the 48 genera and to the species. Each species is provided with a complete bibliography, distribution and ecology, while critical notes are attached, and notes on their affinity; 26 spp. are illustrated. There are quite some novel records and also reductions. All names are alphabetically arranged. Antidesma (Stilaginaceae) and Galearia (Pandaceae) are added. The largest genera are Macaranga 85 spp. (elaborated by Whitmore), Glochidion 67, Phyllanthus 42, Claoxylon 29, Antidesma 27, and Mallotus 20. Euphorbia is by A.Radcliffe-Smith.

In contrast to his similar, former work on Borneo Euphorbiaceae there are less genera but more species, which is ascribed to speciation going on more rapidly in a younger land. The work is a boon to Malesian botany.—v.St.

Analysis of the flora of the Lesser Sunda Islands; this makes an integral part of the Malesian flora. Argumentation of exchange between the Australia+New Guinea and Indo-Malesian floras via New Guinea; its one-sidedness because of the oligotrophic nature of Australian soils. Summary of geology of New Guinea. Explanation of Torres Strait barrier in botany. Contacts mainly from Miocene onwards when New Guinea grew from archipelagic conditions to a solid landsurface. An earlier Cretaceous contact is required by botany in plate tectonics theory. Other topics are an analysis of the 10 elements of the Australian flora; scleromorphic aspect of Australian plants due to mineral-starved soil; the myth of long-distance dispersal again argumented. The land-bridge theory explained as the 'land-theory' to correct a misinterpretation by many botanists. The undesirable layout, for which the editor is responsible, is regretted by the author.—v.St.
